came into Albany to-night from over the Schenectady turnpike and journeyed on to find a place in the fields beyond to camp. His gray hair hung down over his shoulders, but he held himself erect to the full stature of six feet, and, though he walked slowly, he steadily covered ground. He says his name is Levi Jones, and that he started last March from Denver, Col., to walk to New York, and go thence to Washington any way he pleased, so long as he gets there by the time Congress convenes. It is for a ten-thousand-dollar wager, and he says that when the bet was made he weighed three hundred pounds. By the terms of the wager, he says, he is to have no money, nor is he to sleep under a roof until New York is reached. Accordingly, he carries a roll of old quilts and blankets under his left arm and a gunny sack with cooking utensils on his back, while in his hand he carries an old tin can over half full of tea leaves that had been used several times. That he did not ask for money to help him along, and rather sought to conceal than reveal his identity, lends color to his story.
